WANI'S STORY

On New Year's Eve in 2010, I made one decision that what would change the entire trajectory of my life. That decision was that instead of going out to party with friends in Miami to bring in the new year, I chose to stay home instead and analyze my life.

I first started out with the positives. I looked at all of achievements that year and wrote those down. I then looked at my failures, and taking full responsibility, I asked myself, "What happened? What went wrong?"

The short end of it?

I was in love for the first time. I was also in business for myself for the very first time.

Then, I knew nothing about how to run a business, but only how to be a lawyer, and mixing both stifled any real chance of success.

Next, I looked at my beliefs. I wrote out every limiting belief I had about myself and when I was done being brutally honest, I got prayed the most reverent prayer ever to this day, asking the Universe, to help me release them.

Why?

I knew the beliefs that I had about myself was exactly what was creating my reality, and I wanted a new reality. And in order to have that, I needed a new set of beliefs.

When I was finished, I forgave myself, and it was now time to look to the future. I got out a brand-new journal with the word "IMAGINE" on it and started to write. I wrote down everything I wanted to be, do, have, and to experience the next year. I wrote with no limits.

I wrote as if the sky wasn't even the limit, but the viewpoint.

Then, I visualized myself having everything on that list. I said affirmations and mantras around them. And when midnight came, I took one sip of champagne I had in a glass and fell asleep. After all, I had been at this self-reflection process since 6:30 am that morning.

Unbeknownst to me, I had no idea what I had just done. But, that day was the end of my world, as I knew it.

Three days later, everything changed.

My predominantly Spanish speaking world in Miami began invaded with all things Paris, France, French culture, French this and French that. It was wild. Every single day for an entire year, I was bombarded with daily signs of Paris. And one day in August, my heart finally spoke to me and said, "Move. Move to Paris."

And so, in October of that year, I sold my car, sold my apartment, and gave away all of my things to three different charities in Miami.

I moved to Paris ---- a city where I knew no one, a country I had no connection to, not knowing one word of French, and without any plan whatsoever as to what I was going to do, once I got there.

I didn't know it at the time, but I was cultivating a workable framework and teachable strategy to inspire anyone who is looking to change their life but just doesn't know how to understand that no external change can happen in our lives, unless we first change internally. That we are the catalyst and the materializer of any great change in we week.

Until we change, nothing changes.

And, changing, changes everything.

Today, I speak and help organizations thrive and excel through change. Using my own life story that has been cultivated with a lifetime of constant change since the age of one, coupled with my practical and repeatable framework, I show organizations how their leaders can lead with change, inspire their teams, and transform their culture, and thrive.
